PROLOGUE

*As a visual act, 'to see' unaware is equal to being blind.
'To look' with awareness is a visual experience, an art.*

Hans Hofmann

The drawings and poems made by Margaret Beisenbeckin this book have a peculiar sensitivity. They are the result of her plastic fantasy, her flare for art, and her imperious necessity to represent on the paper her dreams, ideas and images, which like fairies or ghosts tell a story or picture her poems.

From a very personal mark, this barely ten-year-old girl allows us to enter a magical world of oneiric representations with a high degree of expressiveness. This fascinates the connoisseur of visual arts and art in general.

The value and quality of this series of drawings and paintings are the result of the seriousness, the effort and the degree of consciousness, with which Margaret has assimilated specific work tools from her naivety and originality. Devices such as the valuated line, balance, overlapping of shapes, collage, spatial relations, gesture of the stroke, and squiggles or scribbles made as a drill or as an expression of tiredness have allowed her to discover new shapes for her imagination to rise again.

As Margaret's professor, I have been like become an accomplice of this beautiful process of creativity. This has permitted me to trespass the borders limiting the domains which lead to accepting the real fact and its analogies; this intermediate limit of the experience between ludic and artistic creation.

Margaret's artistic process can be located in three moments: drawing unceasingly to exhaustion; then selecting what she feels is convenient; later, recovering by making colored blotches and lines bursting of action driven by gesture. For her these strokes are abstract; for the connoisseur they go beyond that. They are signs, which as magical archetypes encode and impose the shapes to understand art.
